A. Conclusion

Based on the discussion of the previous chapters, the researcher can give several conclusions, namely:

1. Teaching preparation is an important part of the learning process. The preparations made by the tutor are cognitive preparation, affective preparation, and psychomotor preparation. This preparation makes learning easy for students to understand.
2. Implementation of learning is certainly the most important part of a learning process. That is why tutors carry out opening activities, main activities, and closing activities. Because without these activities, the process of learning between tutors and students will not good.
3. This evaluation is also needed by the tutor to find out the extent of the abilities that have been obtained by students. at the same time can be used in improving student learning. The method used by the tutor to evaluate it can be by holding a test.
